

Ronce Almond

Managing Director
International Government Affairs
American Airlines

Ronce Almond is Managing Director, International Government Affairs, at American Airlines. Based in the airline's Washington office, he plays a leading role in advocating the airline's policy and legal priorities in international affairs before the U.S. federal government, foreign authorities, and international institutions.

Prior to joining American, Ronce was Senior Counsel at the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee. As the top Democratic staffer on the Subcommittee on Aviation, he led historic legislation and policies to address challenges facing aviation and shape the future of the global aerospace industry. He also helped confirm Cabinet members and leadership of the Department of Transportation, Federal Aviation Administration, Transportation Security Administration and National Transportation Safety Board.

Before serving on Capitol Hill, Ronce was a partner and vice president at a DC-based law and consulting firm focused on aerospace, transportation, and international aviation. In addition to being a member of the Aero Club of Washington Board of Governors, he served on the Editorial Board of the Air & Space Lawyer, a journal of the American Bar Association. Ronce has also taught at Georgetown University School of Law and published extensively on aviation, international law and national security.

Ronce holds a Juris Doctor, cum laude, and Master of Arts (Political Science) from Duke University and a Bachelor of Arts (History), cum laude, from George Washington University.
